A CARD FROM WEBER.

To THE PUBLIC AND THE TRADE:

Foolish rumors having been circulated by unscrupulou business rivals that the woll known house of Albert Webe would not survive the death of its founder and is about tundergo some change, I take this method of saying public; that all such stories are wholly take and malricus. Nothings whatever has taken place or will take place in the financial standing of the house, in its unequalled method of manufacture or trade, or in agents or employes when have been so long identified with it.

With overy intention and with sunle means and assurances of auccess the present proprietor, who has had charge of the business for the past year during the illness of the father) the founder of the past year during the illness of the father) the founder of the past year during the onergies and experience to the preserving and extending the prestign and induced of the establishment already so widely known.
